

IATI Open Aid Information Licensing Public domain

Summary

We are an organisation that believes in open knowledge. A lot of factors help make knowledge open, including things like the kind of file format used, and the kind of software it takes to access it. But knowledge isn't truly open unless all the legal rights in that knowledge get addressed.

We like our users to know up front what they can do with the data and information we provide, and so we created this document.

It is also our policy to respect the intellectual property rights of others. We in turn ask others to respect our intellectual property rights.

This document sets out our policy on copyright and other IP rights related to the aid information we provide. It also references the specific licenses for how our aid information may be used.

The IATI database

Unless otherwise noted, the IATI database is dedicated to the public domain using CCo and the Open Data Commons Public Domain Dedication and License (PDDL). This means that we have given up our rights in copyright, database rights, and contract over the aid information.

In short you may:

Share – copy, use, and distribute the aid information to others

Create – make new works with the aid information

Adapt – modify or transform the aid information, change it into different formats, or combine it with other data sources.

We place no further restrictions on this aid information.

Full details of your rights under CCZero and the PDDL are at:

PDDL: <http://www.opendatacommons.org/licenses/pddl/>

CCo: <http://creativecommons.org/publicdomain/zero/1.0/>

We spend a lot of time, effort, and even money in getting this data and turning it into a workable and highly usable resource. We provide aid, and as part of providing aid, produce aid information. We hope that by sharing this aid information with you under as permissively as possible will bring benefits both to us, and more importantly, to aid recipients, by improving aid flows.

Our licenses do not require you to attribute your use of our database. We ask that you attribute us if you appreciate our work and are able, as your attribution allows us to demonstrate support and impact of our work, which in turn helps us to continue our work.

Fair dealing, Fair use, and other exceptions to copyright law

Some aid information may be presented here as a result of copyright exceptions such as fair dealing, fair use, or other exceptions. This information is not ours to dedicate to the public domain, and so as a result this copyright policy does not cover aid information used here under these exceptions. Therefore your use of this material may not come under the same legal exception from which we benefit. If you have any doubts, you should consult an appropriate legal professional licensed in your jurisdiction.

Public domain

If any part of the aid information here was already in the public domain – without copyright under the relevant law – this document in no way changes that status. We also take the position that factual information on its own is not covered by copyright. These licenses cover our databases where there may be questions over how that jurisdiction that may protect the factual information in the database, and to cover any information protected by copyright contained in the aid information.

Attribution

If you use the aid information database as a whole or in part for a new database, best practice would be to keep our public domain dedication in place for other users to see, though this is not required.

If you'd like to attribute us, we ask that you use the following phrase:

Contains aid information from IATI which is made available
under the ODC Attribution License.
